Home Without a Cooky Jar. Leonardo da Vinci was very beautiful all his life, and even when quite small never found his lessons any trouble to him. He liked drawing and modeling best, however. Verrocchio was the name of his master, and he said when he first saw Leonardo's drawings, "He will be a great artist some day." One day Leonardo's father brought a roughly made wooden shield to him and asked him to paint something on it. Leonardo had heard the story of Perseus and the wonderful Medusa's head which he gave to Athena to wear on her shield, so that when her enemies saw it they were turned to stone. He therefore determined to paint something on the shield that would horrify enemies at least, if it did not exactly turn them into stone. He gathered together serpents, locusts, bats and all the queerest little animals he could think of and shut himself up in a room alone with them. As he watched them squirming about, ideas came to him of a horrible monster, which he painted on the shield, wriggling out of a dark cavern. When he had finished, he placed the picture him back, saying: "That is just the effect I wanted my picture to have. This is the shield you asked me to paint." Ser Piero was greatly astonished at his son's genius and sold the painting for a large sum of money. It is now lost, though there is a fine picture of a monster in Florence which some people think must be on an easel and called his father in to see it. His father, not expecting any-

Leonardo was always fond of animals, especially horses, which he often drew and painted. He once kept quite a menagerie of animals, which we are told he cared for with infinite kindness and consideration. He was fond of very out of the way pets, such as glowworms, hedgehogs, etc. Often as he passed places where little birds were sold he would pay the price asked for them, open the cage doors and let them fivclamen and columbine, both exceeding-
